PHILOSOPHICAL PONDERINGS

Watched this Hindi movie that's really popular right now called "Saiyaara", and it's basically like "La La Land" except they get back together in the end and somehow make it work. In both movies basically the guy's life goal is to be a famous musician, and the girl in some way hinders his ability to do so. I am actively trying to date again after a while, and it had me thinking- I would've dumped the girl twenty minutes into either movie. I don't know if I believe in love enough to really truly make a large sacrifice of any kind in the name of it. Sure I'll do the dishes or drive your mom to the airport or whatever, but for me to really fundamentally change my lifestyle and goals for anyone else? I just don't think I could and therefore idk if I'll ever really fall in love.

SHI THAT HAPPENED

Good

- I went to a friends eco-market thingy and then we got Chai Pani after
- I never really unpacked from Atlantic Station so packing for DC is super easy
- Last week of my grandma's delicious food and I took some home in the scooter (see pic below)

Bad

- My dad won't let me take my perfect desk from home because it was his first desk in college and he's sentimental
- So I had to go rent a pickup truck to get a new desk and also a new bed, but they didn't have any trucks when I got there so they gave me a 16 foot box truck and then had the audacity to charge me full price for the large truck even when I reserved a small cheap truck man Home Depot count ur days

NIGHTMARE OF THE WEEK

I haven't made new friends in so so long, and I don't even know where to begin with the whole endeavor. The main ways I've made solid friends in the past has been through organizations (Robotics, India Club, freshman living experience, etc.) but now I feel like there are less of those kinds of organizations around in post-grad. And I don't even know where to find them to begin with. I bought four chairs for my living room who tf gonna sit in them???
