

TEJAS SHAH

MAY 28, 2026

ISSUE #35

THE ALCHEMIST

In 6th grade, our Language Arts teacher made us read this book called the Alchemist. It's a pretty "deep" book about finding your true calling and passion.

Honestly I was a pretty bad person in middle school. I didn't have a lot of friends and I definitely did not treat the few that I did have right. I was basically focused on learning technology and gaming and nothing else, which set me up very well for my career looking back but not at all well socially.

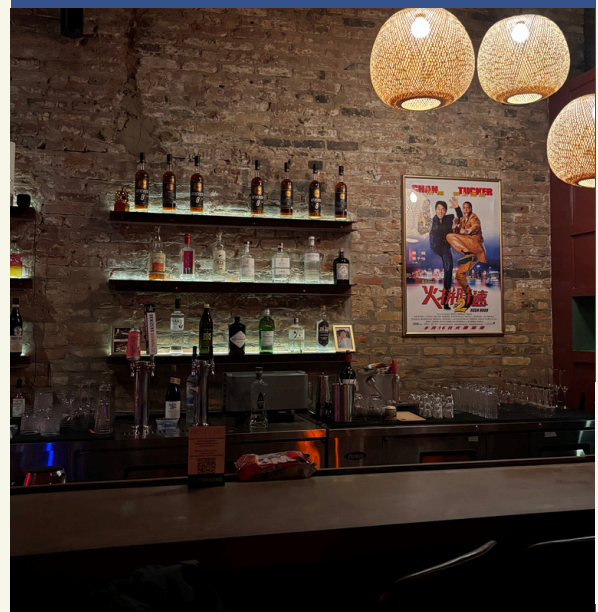

All that to say, I did not properly appreciate the message of the book when I was forced to read it in 6th grade. The arts as a whole was not something I gained an appreciation for until way later in high school when I met you lovely people and got more involved with SASA / India Club.

Thus, I have proposed to our book club that we re-read it, just so I can determine whether there's actually something there or whether it's all BS. Here's to another great book!

SHI THAT HAPPENED

- Parents came into town! Was a good time to see them again and have everyone cramped in my tiny apartment
- Work this week actually went pretty well, had a LOT of work but I felt appreciated for that work
- Omkar is currently pacing around my apartment like a stressed camel

NIGHTMARE OF THE WEEK

I was crashing out on Monday big time ngl. My parents had all left, and then like immediately after they left my grandfather called and said "So how are you lonely boy", and that just killed me. I was also really worried about a work presentation I had for that AI thing I was building last newsletter, because I expected my director to be a hardass about it.

But he was actually really nice about it, Omkar came into town and made things less lonely, talking with Ananya also helped me reflect on how not deep all this work stuff is, and overall I'm doing better!